Magnificent Head Of Maitreya, Buddha

2nd - 3rd Century A.D.

Schist

H: 25cm

This spectacularly beautiful head of the Bodhisattva Maitreya, the Buddha of the Future, was carved from one of the finest types of schist in Gandhara in the region of modern Northwest-Pakistan. It is very likely, that the head once was part of a standing sculpture of Maitreya; unfortunately, it broke off from that very sculpture in Antiquity. The face shows Maitreya as a young prince and combines the classical Greek-Roman artistic taste for a head of a young man with the sensuous refinement of Indian religious spirit. The nose is aquiline and straight, and follows the lines of the eyebrows. The eyes are open, the lips are relatively small and closed, but show a sensuous smile. The iconographic sign of enlightenment, called 'urna' in Sanskrit was set between the eyebrows. The hairdo is styled extremely fine; the long-curved hair falls down to the neck. The upper part of the hair is shown as a prominent knot on top of the head, called 'ushnisha' in the religious nomenclature of Buddhism. All tufts of the curled hair are finely arranged under a combination of a diadem and kind of hairnet, designed of double rows of pearls. It seems as if two cockades fasten the diadem-like hairnet in front of the hairdo. The ears of Maitreya are elongated and once showed two earrings; unfortunately, only the left ear's earring has survived. The earring of the left ear is designed in form of a rounded, basket-like bead with a mixture of pearled and vertical, straight-line patterns. The Gandharan Maitreya head discussed here is one of the finest and most magnificent Gandharan artworks of this very type, only comparable to similarly finest examples of this type, like to a schist head of Maitreya from Palatu Dheri, now in the Peshawar Museum Pakistan (Ingholt and Islay 1957), one Maitreya-head in the Bombay Museum, followed by the head of a Maitreya-statue in the Lahore Museum Pakistan (Tissot 1986). Of the same exceptional quality and refinement are a head in the Russek-Collection in Switzerland (Russek 1987), one more head in the Musee Guimet in Paris, France (Gies and Cohen 1995), as well as a similarly wonderful head in the Royal Ontario Museum Toronto, Canada (Jongeward 2003), and- last but not least!- the head of a magnificent head of a standing Maitreya from Gandhara in the Norton Simon Museum in Pasadena, California, USA (Pal 2003). This Gandharan schist-head of a Bodhisattva Maitreya must be dated to the 3rd century AD / CE, and should be valued as one of the finest in quality known from international museum-collections worldwide.
